PANEL DISCUSSION:
SUPPLIER DIVERSITY AND VETERAN-OWNED BUSINESSES

_Moderator:_ Amy Sherman, Council for Adult and Experiential Learning
2017
STATE OF SUPPLIER DIVERSITY REPORT:
SUMMARY FINDINGS
Summary Findings: Veteran-Owned Businesses

Characteristics of Veteran-Owned Businesses
- Vast majority are certified - similar to other types of diverse suppliers (minority-owned, women-owned, etc.)
- Tend to be small businesses; more than half of respondents have between 0-10 employees
- Actively pursue government clients - more likely to partner with government clients than other types of diverse suppliers
- Top pipelines for diverse suppliers to find clients are networking events and registration sites

Best Practices for Veteran-Owned Businesses
- Franchises - often mimics the structure of the military, many offer discounts to veterans for franchising setup fees
- Serve as a government contractor - capitalize on the minimum 3% veteran-owned target for public/private sector firms who sell to the government
- Market your business - get certified and registered!
- Collaboration with other veteran-owned businesses
- Retail opportunities - appeals to the veteran community as well as those that actively support the military.
Summary Findings: Supplier Diversity Programs

Best Practices

1. Networking events - get exposure to veteran-owned businesses
2. Encourage supplier collaboration - mentor protégé and supplier development programs
3. Diversity Capital Fund - help veteran-owned businesses get much-needed capital
4. Benchmarking with other public and private corporations
5. Opportunity assessment within supply chain to identify key areas for utilization of veteran-owned businesses

If your organization is a minority-owned business enterprise, is it certified as such?

- Yes: 90%
- In progress: 6%
- No: 4%

If your organization is a woman-owned business enterprise, is it certified as such?

- Yes: 90%
- In progress: 6%
- No: 4%
Respondents to the main question could choose more than one category; for example, a minority-owned business might also classify itself as a small business. Also, many respondents who fit the general definition of a small business—fewer than 100 employees—did not identify themselves as one for this question.

All 16 LGBTQ-owned businesses that answered our survey stated that they were certified.

What impressed us was the percentage of respondents who confirmed that their organizations were certified as diverse. For example, 90 percent of reporting minority-owned businesses said they were certified, as did 90 percent of women-owned businesses; all 16 LGBTQ-owned businesses that answered our survey stated that they were certified as well. Although this suggests our survey drew diverse businesses that were almost all certified, it also shows the importance of certification in the minds of those businesses.
Although diverse suppliers come in all sizes, for the most part, respondents to our survey are technically small businesses—82 percent employ fewer than 100 people, even if they aren’t certified as an SBE. With 41 percent employing fewer than 10, the stakes are high for these companies: They must be proactive in connecting with supplier diversity programs willing to hire them.
The findings from this series of questions present an optimistic picture on the state of supplier diversity. First off, 43 percent of respondents are designated as diverse suppliers by at least four clients’ supplier diversity programs. Moreover, 30 percent were employed by more than six. Good suppliers get noticed by supplier diversity programs and can expand their client base by continuing their outstanding work, networking, and making the most of their certifications.
Nearly half of respondents said 25 percent or less of their business is with members of the Fortune 1000. Only about a third reported that they conducted at least half of their business with the largest enterprises. Although the smallest (0-10 employers) suppliers reported less business with the Fortune 1000, surprisingly, the 11-to-50-employee range (61 percent with more than 25 percent business) outperformed the 51-100 classification (49 percent). That might just be a statistical quirk, but it also suggests a diverse supplier doesn’t need to be big to attract big clients.
More than half of our respondents answered yes to this question. Generally, the more employees a diverse supplier has, the likelier it will go for government contracts. Also, veteran-owned businesses were the most active in pursuing government clients—12 of 13 respondents answered yes to this question.

Finding Partners

What are your top three ways to find corporations to partner with?

Networking events are the most popular way to find corporations—two-thirds of respondents cited networking events as a top-three method. Moreover, choosing “other” gave respondents an opportunity to describe what they meant, and many cited conferences, LinkedIn, and industry events, all of which can easily fall under the networking umbrella as well.

Registration sites are the second-most-cited reason at 51 percent, followed by RFPs at 46 percent and email at 39 percent. Some of the more interesting “other” responses were:

- Bloomberg or other tools that enable you to see who is bidding, incumbents, and so on
- Invitations from Tier 1 suppliers to be a Tier 2 supplier
- Social media and marketing
- Working with procurement
As a consumer, does an organization with a supplier diversity program influence whether or not you will buy from them?

If you need proof that supplier diversity supports the bottom line, here it is: Eighty-four percent of respondents say the existence of a supplier diversity program at least slightly influences their decisions to purchase from such a company; nearly half of respondents say it has a strong influence. The results are not surprising—buying from organizations that believe in supplier diversity is a way to support diverse businesses, and consumers realize it.
What do you enjoy most about supplier diversity?

This question gave respondents a chance to tell us what they like about the importance of supplier diversity. Their answers were enlightening:

• “I firmly believe you cannot have innovation without diversity.”
• “Ability to be competitive with large organizations and play in the same playing field.”
• “Access to resources and information on how to do business with corporations.”
• “It is a source of ideas for innovation. Market intelligence and insights.”
• “I believe it just levels the playing field and allows otherwise disadvantaged companies to have a chance.”
• “It provides a mechanism for large organizations and new, young organizations to connect.”

The opportunity to work with America’s best companies.

• “Promotes innovation through the entrance of new products, services, and solutions.”
• “Supplier diversity can only make a business gain better insight into new ideas, innovations.”
• “Provides multiple channels from which to procure goods and services. Drives competition (on price and service levels) between the company’s existing and potential vendors. Allows a company to take advantage of new opportunities for business expansion with the emergence of new consumer needs based upon shifting demographic realities.”
• “Recognition by government agencies, and privileges to work for the esteemed companies and government departments.”
• “Supplier diversity has given our woman-owned business the opportunity to present our capabilities and innovative programs to America’s top corporations. This type of access is invaluable and gives us the opportunity to compete based on our abilities.”
• “I am proud to be part of a group that is making a positive difference.”
• “Being able to network with like-minded professionals.”
• “Equal opportunity for small and medium business to succeed.”
• “I enjoy the camaraderie!”
• “It helps open doors with customers that have a diversity initiative and puts us on a level playing field. We still have to show our credentials, but at least we get a listening ear.”
• “It leads to a more connected, more inclusive planet.”
• “It is the first time in my career where my personal and professional beliefs fully align.”

STATE OF SUPPLIER DIVERSITY REPORT - SUPPLIER DIVERSITY PROGRAMS
How do you locate diverse suppliers?
Choose all that apply

- Certification agencies: 66% (111)
- Third-party provider: 48% (69)
- Google search: 41% (60)
- Through other diverse suppliers: 47% (68)
- Other: 28% (41)

How many methods did the respondent choose?

- Chose all 5 methods: 7% (11)
- Chose 4 methods: 30% (44)
- Chose 3 methods: 16% (22)
- Chose 2 methods: 29% (42)
- Chose 1 method: 18% (26)

These responses confirm that there is no one perfect way to discover diverse suppliers—vendors can be found through a variety of channels and strategies. Almost 70 percent of respondents use more than one method, suggesting a multi-pronged approach is a best practice for supplier diversity programs. Among the “other” methods respondents offered when asked:

- Business assistance programs focused on local businesses, which then can turn into diverse suppliers
- Supplier diversity and matchmaking events
- Business associates

Also notable is that certification agencies were the top method of finding diverse businesses, suggesting that becoming certified should be a top priority for suppliers seeking more exposure. Connecting companies and diverse suppliers is a challenge for vendors as well. We also conducted a complementary survey of diverse suppliers, and one of the responses we received resonated with this challenge:

Connecting with companies that require diverse supplier relationships yet not being in the right place at the right time that would allow us to participate.
08 TIER 1 DIVERSE SUPPLIERS

What percentage of your Tier 1 supplier spend is with diverse suppliers?

- 0-5%: 26%
- 5-10%: 38%
- >10%: 36%

Supplier diversity programs are finding a decent level of success with increasing and maintaining their diverse spend.

Almost three-quarters of respondents reported at least 5 percent of their programs’ Tier 1 spend is with diverse suppliers. This result isn’t exactly unexpected but is a good indicator that supplier diversity programs are finding a decent level of success with increasing and maintaining their diverse spend.
More than two-thirds of respondents measure Tier 2 spend. Continuing the trend, larger companies and more mature supplier diversity programs were likelier to track Tier 2 results than their smaller and newer counterparts.
“Contributes to supply-chain excellence, complements our commitment to economic development of our community, strengthens our institutional brand with our key stakeholders, and mirrors our community.”

“Supplier diversity has an impact on our ability to increase market share.”

“Contributes to supply-chain excellence, complements our commitment to economic development of our community, strengthens our institutional brand with our key stakeholders, and mirrors our community.”

“Supplier diversity has an impact on our ability to increase market share.”

How do you measure the ROI of your supplier diversity program?

We presented this topic as an open-ended question—rather than check off an answer, respondents described how they measure return on investment. The responses are varied, though, notably, at least a quarter of participants say they do not measure ROI. Here is a sampling of the answers to this question:

- “Our customers require supplier diversity, and it is part of the proposal process. Supplier diversity has an impact on our ability to increase market share.”
- “Small businesses provide lower costs and affordability for our customer. They also bring innovation to current products.”
- “In the future, we may measure the ROI by dollars saved switching to diverse suppliers that were less costly, or by the number of grants we receive related to having a successful program.”
- “Cost savings that diverse suppliers bring to new sourcings.”
- “Comparing new cost and diversity versus old or current sources.”
- “We measure ROI indirectly through the evaluation of all suppliers and the proportion of them that are small.”
Do you measure the economic impact of your program?

We did ask respondents who answered “yes” a sub-question about how they measure the economic impact of their supplier diversity programs. The responses included:

- By the number of new jobs created
- Through cost reductions
- The number of local employees hired by diverse suppliers in support of a new contract
- Annual economic impact reports
- Affordability for the customer for RFPs and contracts
- The number of contracts awarded and the number of county residents hired
- Overall economic conditions—downturns in the market that lead to less supplier diversity program impact
Where do you see supplier diversity going in the next three to five years?

Supplier diversity is always growing and evolving, and our survey’s participants have some strong opinions on where it is going. Here are some of their responses to this question:

Becoming a tool of market development and competitive advantage.

- “My hope is that it will continue to be a priority for organizations going forward. With that said, it remains an important initiative as corporations should continue to diversify their supply base, consumer base, and employee base. This breeds idea generation and innovation.”
- “Hopefully, still as a viable entity and program in the midst of a changing world.”
- “I feel it has stagnated.”
- “I see it decreasing and not being looked at as a value to companies. Until we can get the government to lead by pushing the bar and holding companies to the fire, they will not do it on their own.”
- “I see supplier diversity growing, in particular for LGBT and disabled vets. I also think there will be political changes that will test the fabric and value of supplier diversity programs.”
- “In the current environment, not much change unless there are significant tax changes.”
- “Corporations will have to make it a necessary business imperative to stay competitive and to keep pace with shifting demographics and the emerging consumer base and its buying power.”
- “Will be more structured and with defined roles.”

Enable our purchasers (end users) to include themselves in the process of identifying diverse suppliers from our database and then purchase from them.

- “Becoming a tool of market development and competitive advantage.”
- “Continue to develop a comprehensive program and enable our purchasers (end users) to include themselves in the process of identifying diverse suppliers from our database and then purchase from them.”
- “Becoming more ingrained into our sourcing process and becoming more of a requirement than a nice-to-have.”
- “Due to the procurement practice of consolidation, I believe that most programs will become ‘subcontracting-focused’ programs. The emphasis will be on helping prime vendors find diverse vendors to utilize and on their spend reporting.”
- “Expanding to become a requirement for all companies.”
- “Given the current climate of our country, corporations will have a larger responsibility to empower, partner with, and mentor diverse firms.”

This breeds idea generation and innovation.

I also think there will be political changes that will test the fabric and value of supplier diversity programs.
What are the primary drivers of your supplier diversity program?
Choose all that apply

Corporate responsibility topped the results for this question, followed by alignment with corporate culture and workforce inclusiveness, customer requirements, and government compliance. Also, about three-quarters of respondents chose more than three drivers—evidence that a variety of factors are important to companies striving for supplier diversity. Among the “other” responses given, we found this one most interesting:

Our foundation, corporate funders, and supporters necessitate, acknowledge, and understand the impact and benefits of having a supplier diversity program.
Supplier Inclusion and Diversity: Veteran-Owned Businesses

Nancy Conner
Director of Certification, NaVOBA

nancy.conner@navoba.com
What is Supplier Inclusion & Diversity?

- Corporate programs to measure the impact of their spend within diversity communities
- Originally focused on communities of color, then women, and later disabled, veteran and LGBT owned businesses
- Corporations require third party certification by NMSDC, WBENC, USBLN, NGLCC, etc.
- They expect their suppliers to reflect their values
- They also require an inclusive supply chain, and ask their suppliers to report spend
- The best corporations aspire to become members of the Billion Dollar Roundtable
- These 27 companies spend in excess of $1 Billion per year with diverse suppliers.
Why is an Inclusive Supply Chain Important?

- Although many believe government mandates are the business driver for Supplier Diversity, the reality is that corporations represent an even bigger buying pool.
- Corporations know that including ALL businesses within their supply chain leads to competitive pricing, better and more agile supplier solutions, increased corporate social responsibility and greater bottom line impact.

A Best Practice for Supporting Veteran Employment:
Entrepreneurship is one area that has proven to help increase post-military success for many veterans. Veterans are twice as likely to start a business as non-veteran counterparts and hire more veterans as employees.
What is NaVOBA?

NaVOBA is an independent 501(c)(3) nonprofit organization led by Corporate Supplier Diversity professionals.

NaVOBA’s mission is to create corporate contracting opportunities for America’s Veteran’s and Service-Disabled Veteran’s Business Enterprises (VBEs/SDVBEs) through certification, advocacy, outreach, recognition and education.
Save the Date!

NaVOBA is working together with our friends at the National Veterans Small Business Coalition for the 2018 Veterans Entrepreneurship and Training Symposium (VETS).

This year’s event will be in Colonial Williamsburg, Virginia at the Williamsburg Lodge from June 10 - 14, 2018.

VETS 2018 aims to make veteran business owners successful by learning from experts and other small business owners. This is a great opportunity to connect and network with NaVOBA’s Corporate Allies.
